Sino alla morte is a “constructed opera”; it pairs music by two Italian composers, Barbara Strozzi (1619-1677) and Salvatore Sciarrino (1947- ) and is inspired by Sophocles’ The Women of Trachis.

We focus on part of the play and on several characters. In the beginning, Queen Deianeira is lamenting the absence of her husband, Heracles. His visits to her and their children are infrequent, and she suffers from his neglect. A messenger arrives to tell her that Heracles is victorious in his recent battle and will soon be home. A group of beautiful young women accompany the messenger; he tells Deianeira that they are inhabitants from a vanquished city and have come to serve as slaves. Yet when Deianeira observes them, a strange compassion overtakes her. The glance of one young woman, in particular, pierces her heart.

Deianeira approaches the young woman, and when they regard each other, the queen becomes convinced that something is wrong. An old man approaches Deianeira: he needs to tell her the truth. Heracles has vanquished the foreign city, not for riches or political gain, but because he is in love with Iole - the very same young woman who has captured Deianeira’s attention. Deianeira is shaken; while she does not blame her husband or Iole for the passion that they feel, she is now lost.

Deianeira possesses a potion, made from the blood of a minotaur, who once ferried her across a river. Overcome with lust, the minotaur attempted to violate her midstream, but was interrupted by Heracles, whose arrow pierced the monster’s breast. As he was dying, the minotaur told Deianeira to make a potion of the blood pouring from his breast. If she were ever to doubt Heracles’ love, that potion in contact with his skin, would bring Heracles back to her, and her alone. Against her better judgment, Deianeira makes a dye from the potion; she stains the interior of a cloak and orders that cloak to be given to Heracles. No other man must wear it.

After the cloak is on its way, Deianeira observes a piece of wool she used to dye the cloak; it has disintegrated and in the place where it was, a bubbling acid remains. She realizes she has been deceived. The minotaur sought to kill Heracles, and unwittingly, she has allowed this to occur. She cannot endure life without Heracles and kills herself.

What is the impetus for juxtaposing the music of Barbara Strozzi (1619-1677) and Salvatore Sciarrino (1947 - )? Beyond the common understanding of the musical genre, the word “opera” literally translated, means “deed” or “work”. Sino alla morte is best understood in this context. In the work, we bring together two composers who have written vocal music of profound expressivity and intense beauty.

Sciarrino’s rarely performed vocal sextet Le donne di Trachis (1980) is the heart of the evening. Written for unaccompanied female voices, it presents an overview of the entire story, from the point of view of the chorus of women, so integral to the play - commenting on the action, providing words of solace and providing perspective on the tragedy. It is an evocative score, full of understated expressivity and sonic richness that is extremely compelling. When I discovered it among the offerings in our wonderfully rich collection of scores at UC San Diego, it set my imagination on an unexpected journey.

At the same time, I had been listening to the music of Barbara Strozzi. Strozzi’s life would be considered extraordinary in any age. She had the artistic and intellectual freedom to pursue a life in music, as a composer and as a virtuoso singer. Without the support of the Church or the patronage of nobility, she was nonetheless one of the most widely published composers of her day.

As I listened to Strozzi’s music, both the early works, delightful and full of light, to the profoundly moving late solo cantatas, I wondered what a “conversation” between the music of these two composers could bring. The Women of Trachis, with its timeless story of the love and desire, seemed a place where both worlds might meet. By bringing them together around a central narrative, some possibilities are lost - for example, the delicious double meanings integral to texts of Baroque music (i.e. equating death with the ecstasy of physical love). But Strozzi’s virtuosic late cantatas also seemed to speak to the rich psychology of Deianeira: a woman who could not blame her husband and his lover for their passion, yet risked and lost all, for love.
